Let's Explore!

Jealousy can be hard to shake!

* "To shake" is another way to say to get rid of.

Instructions: Read the text aloud.

For many years a man, his wife, and their little son had lived together happily in a little village in China. The father was a woodsman and used a great axe to chop down trees. One day, the father became very ill. He called his son and said, "I want you to take good care of your mother, for she is a good woman. And here is something for you. Take this axe. Whenever you are sad and lonely, hold it and you will feel my strength, the strength I had when I was young." By the time the sun rose again, he had died. The boy was very sad and he treasured the axe given to him by his father.

The young man missed his father greatly. His mother, filled with loneliness, married again. The new husband, consumed by jealousy, hated the son. When the new husband saw the young man holding the axe, he said to his wife, "Your son is thinking about killing me. He is going to use that axe." This angered the mother and she asked her son, "Why are you trying to kill your stepfather?" The son replied, "I am only holding this axe, which Father had given to me before he died. He told me I could always feel his strength in it. Do not worry. I would never try to kill your husband. I love you too much to hurt anyone that you love."

The woman understood and loved her son even more because of his love for both his father and his mother. She too felt the empty space left by the father's death. Even the stepfather felt regret and said, "I am sorry. Please forgive me." He had been so jealous that he had not thought about the young man's sorrow. The son forgave him and the family lived together in peace. Whenever the young man wanted to feel the strength of his father, he held his father's axe.

Learning Points

The Past Perfect in Narrative Sequence

The Past Perfect can be used to talk about sequences of events. You can use the Past Perfect in a narrative when you want to write more eloquently and make your style of writing more dynamic.

You use the Past Perfect to talk about an event that was completed before another past event. Therefore, it is often connected to a Simple Past event. You use the Past Perfect with conjunctions such as and, that, because, so and when, or prepositions such as before and already.

I had forgotten my wallet at school so I had to borrow money.

He had bought flowers before he learned she was feeling ill.

They had eaten so much at the lunch buffet that they didn't have any dinner.

The Past Perfect event finished before the Simple Past event.

The Past Perfect is usually connected to another event in the past. Otherwise, we would use the Simple Past.

You also use the Past Perfect to express a period of time before another event happened in the past using the preposition for.

We had had that house for twenty years before it fell apart.

By the time Janice finished her assignment, she had been working on it for over over a week.

Examples:

- For many years a man, his wife, and their little son had lived together happily in a little village in China.
- By the time the sun rose again, he had died.
- I am only holding this axe, which Father had given to me before he died.
- He had been so jealous that he had not thought about the young man's sorrow.

Learning Points

The Participle Clause: The Past Participle

Participle clauses (like past participles) can be used after a noun just like relative clauses. They give more information.

We received the letter sent by the company.

(= We received the letter that had been sent by the company.)

This church, constructed in the 14th century, is the pride of our town.

(= This church, which was constructed in the 14th century, is the pride of our town.)

She likes pies made from fresh fruit.

(= She likes pies that are made from fresh fruit.)

Examples:

- The boy was very sad and he treasured the axe given to him by his father.
- His mother, filled with loneliness, married again.
- The new husband, consumed by jealousy, hated the son.
- She too felt the empty space left by the father's death.
